Today's War Moves

By J. W. T. MASON
British United Press War Expert
Exclusive to Edmonton Building
FIRST indication of the extent of British plans for continuing their offensive tent of British plans for continuing their offensive against Italy has been re-vealed by Winston Churchill's address to the Italian people. The British Prime Minister declared the Italian Empire in Africa was to be "torn to shreds and tatters," and thereafter, Britain and Italy will "come to much closer grips." If the war continues, will "come of much closer grips." If the war continues, to show much caution in predict, on of the Churchill government to show much caution in predict, in the subsection of the sur moves. The British people have not been government, were confident of producing them.

The indirect approach seeks one of four advantages:

(A) upsetting the enemy's dispositions and by compelling a sudden change of front dislocating his forces; (B) separating his forces; (C) endangering his supply lines; (D) menucing his route of retreat.

The British strategy attained all four objectives an explains the initial dispersal of the Italian force Achievement of only one would have put the Fascist at acute disadvantage. Accomplishment of all four mad their position unlessly.

RELIED ON DESERT BARRIER

The Italians had pushed 70 miles into Egypt to Sidi Barrani. The sea projected their left flank from all but naval shelling. The Egyptian plateau desert, adjudged impassable to troops in force, protected their right flant.

The British had retreated 100 miles farther down th coast to their main base at Merseh Mairuh. Both force were dependent for supplies on coastal roads.

The British attack began as an apparent frontal assault on the Italian force at Sidi Barrani. Italian support

The vital column—the indirect attackers—moved anothwest from Merseh Matruh and mide a wide hulf-circle north through the desert adjudged impassable. Advance units had buried supplies along the protected desert earlies at midth to the control of the columns.

The decision to attempt the desert sortic is in line with the teachings of indirect strategy, which hold it is better to beach difficult teregin than to make from all z saults because "all conditions are more calculable, all separated, and the Sidi Barrani forces were disorganize by the necessity of changing their front to fight the attact

The whole force in Sidi Barrani, cut off in the rear, assailed on both flanks by naval units and the desert troops, and in front by the decoy column, was lost. Some 25,000 were captured.

CUT OFF RETREAT

A third British column, stemming from the vital column, made another wice sweep and fell on the Italian forces at Sollum. This again cut off the retresting Italians, penning another force between the second and

Those Italians who escaped both roundups were pounded by British warships as they piled up in the bottleneck, less than 500 yards wide, between precipi-

Whatever the result of succeeding British movements beyond Sollum in Libya, the manoeuvres which forced the Italian invaders from Egypt were a triumph for the school of strategy which postulates for indirect approach

Aussies Arrive To "Blitz" Italians

Australian troops unload their light armored Bren-gun carrier somewhere in Egypt as British Empire troops continued their successful biltzkrieging of II Dates' invading Blackshitts. Light vehicles like this proved very successful over the desert sands and are credited with a large measure of the success against
